" Ni fallat fatum, Scotti quocunque locatum

" Invenient lapidem, regnare tenentur ibi dem." Boethii Scot. Hist. Lib. i. fol 2.

Thus translated by Holinshed :— " This stone was in fashion like a seat, or chair, having such a fatal destiny, as the Scots say, following it, that wheresoever it should be found, there should the Scotsmen reign, and have the supreme governance. Hereof it came to pass, that first in Spaine, after in Ireland, and then in Scotland, the kings which ruled over the Scotishmen, received the crown sitting upon that stone, until the time of Robert the first, king of Scotland. The inscription also of the stone, though engraven long time after, as should appear, was this :

Except old sawes doo faile,
and wizards wits be blind,
The Scots in place must reigne,
where they this stone shall find."

NA, contr. for Ann, joined to possessive pronouns, of the same person and number as the verb, is used as the nominative after substantive verbs in Latin, when the nominative following the verb is indefinite. “ Tha iad 'nam' (na 'm) fiamuisibh 'nan aghaidh fén.” Isai. xliv. 9.
